試題內容 (含選項)	▲ 閱讀下文，回答第 1-5 題 A glacier is a large accumulation of crystalline ice, snow, rock, and often liquid water that originates on land and moves downslope under the influence of gravity. Over multiple decades, this continuing accumulation of snow results 1 the presence of a large mass of snow for the glacier process to begin. Twenty thousand years ago, the Earth was held by probing fingers of ice that drew power from freezing places in the north and crept southwestward to 2 forests, fields, and mountains. 3 decreased rapidly and land surfaces in many parts of the world were depressed by the weight of the pushing ice. At the same time, so much water was drawn from the oceans to form these glaciers that sea levels around the world 4 by three hundred and fifty feet, and large areas of the continental shelf became dry land. This period of the Earth's history has come to be called the Ice Age. About eleven million square miles of land were covered with ice. The Ice Age 5 about fourteen thousand years ago when the ice sheets began to cease. It took about seven thousand years for the ice to retreat to its present level. 1.
